Dear Mrs. Roosevelt,

On this the first anniversary of Mr. Roosevelt's death, I felt it would be nice to just write a note to you. Before, I knew you would have thousands of letters from people all over the world telling you of their sympathy, and I did not write.

The late President always had my great admiration, and I might add that this admiration extends to you also.
I know your influence must have been a wonderful thing to him, and no doubt he was very proud of you. So on this day, in this far off corner of the British Empire it may be a comfort to you to know that you are not forgotten.

I pray that you will be constantly upheld by the knowledge that your husband was a great man in his lifetime, and that his influence will be felt by the world for generations to come.

Please do not worry about answering this. I know your correspondence must be a great problem; I only wanted to say these few words in the hope they would bring you a measure of comfort.

Sincerely yours,

Audreye Clarke
